1. Technical requirements

The data were captured using Microsoft Access (German 97) and imported into SPSS Version 11. Versions higher than 11 have not been tested for.

2. Introduction into Media Tenor coding

The methodology used in Media Tenor's research combines qualitative and basic statistical methods. Though scholars in the deterministic quantitative tradition could argue that content analysis is only possible by utilising sophisticated statistics, there is of course no universal law requiring such an approach.

A cursory review of research journals in the field of journalism shows that even a journal such as Journalism and Mass Communication Quarterly, with its heavy emphasis on research in the statistical tradition (utilising quantitative research methods ranging from measures of association, e.g. phi-coefficient, to interval data, e.g. correlation and regression analysis (see Babbie, 1989; Bailey, 1987), also publishes research articles based on what one could call 'simplistic' statistics, such as percentages (see Deuze, 2002).

Obviously by taking the above as a departure point, this does not mean that one can ride slip-shot over the data that one collects, since the researcher will still be held accountable for presenting his or her data in a scientific acceptable way. As Stempel (1981) shows, content analysis (also as applied in this research) will need to comply with the ideal of presenting as objective and systematic research procedures possible. This would entail, inter alia, the selection of the unit of analysis; category construction; determining the population; reliability of coding; training of the coders; and the analysis and computerisation of the data (e.g. by means of a statistical programme such as SPSS, see Hansen, Cottle, Negrine & Newbold, 2001).

Hansen et al. (2001) argue in their work on mass communication research methods, that content analysis is by definition a quantitative method. Though the purpose is to identify and count the occurrence of specified categories of texts, there is no specific answer to the question of how far the statistical analysis should be pursued. Fundamentally, they argue that the question of analysis is tied to the research problem.

As is the case in this research, Hansen et al. (2001) show that content analysis is extremely suited for the purpose of comparison (e.g. the number of reports in different media), comparing types of coverage (e.g. positive, negative or neutral) and comparing news reports in the media of different countries. To this end, Hansen et al. (2001) present a coding schedule that is aimed at obtaining basic comparative data to be presented by means of percentages in the format of graphs and tables.

Research design

The data utilised by Media Tenor SA are based on a comprehensive day-by-day analysis of all the news reports in seven major South African daily newspapers (Beeld, Business Day, Sowetan, The Citizen, ThisDay, Pretoria News and The Star), the main SABC news broadcasts (Afrikaans news, English news, Nguni News, Sotho news) as well as e-tv news and five weekly newspapers (City Press, Rapport, Sunday Independent, The Sunday Times, Mail & Guardian). Additionally, two specialised media are analysed (Financial Mail, Finance Week).

The South African newspapers are selected because they represent a comparable group of papers within the range of South African daily and weekly newspapers (general English, Afrikaans, black and business), situated in the same news region (Gauteng province) of South Africa. They also represent a variety of major publishing houses (Independent Group, BDFM, Media24 etc). The two television news channels are the only national South African ones available.

Data are continuously compiled since February 2000. In terms of methodology, the analysis is based on standard content analysis procedures (e.g. Berelson, 1952; Budd, Thorp & Donohew, 1971; Stempel, 1989; Tan, 1982). A computerised methodology is applied, namely that of the international Media Tenor Institute for Media Analysis, whose categories will be explained below.

A total number of 180 (as of March 2003) coders are available in five countries. All coders are equally trained on the criteria of coding and had to pass bi-monthly validation tests as well as weekly spot-checks to establish intercoder-reliability of at least 80% (see Hughes & Garret, 1990 on methods). As far as validity is concerned, high levels of validity are usually obtained due to the construction of the universe on the nominal level. In terms of analysis on the interval level, the content analysis faces similar problems than those experienced in similar situations. In terms of validity on the interval level, Media Tenor tends to 'sin' by rather emphasising the neutral aspects of a statement than exaggerating positive and negative elements.

The following are the criteria applied for most projects:

Object of analysis

In print media, all articles in the political, news, editorial, opinion as well as the business section are included. Excluded are 'advertorials' and other sections of the newspaper clearly indicated as of non-editorial content. Further excluded are letters to the editor.

On TV, all news reports are coded including sport and weather but excluding the re-broadcast of 'highlights' after advertisement breaks.

Unit of analysis

All articles or reports are coded as stated above. An article is defined as an independent graphical unit with separate headlines. Subheadings or bold-faced beginnings of news sentences do not mark new articles, even if they are separately dated or separate locations are named. Articles starting on one page and continuing on another are coded as one and under the first coded article. If, however, an article is referred to by a note (e.g. 'see page 3') at the end of another article, these are considered separate articles. Pictures and graphs are treated as separate articles/report if they do not form part of an existing article/reports but visually separated from other units. On television, every new story is considered a new unit. The introduction to a film report is considered part of the same report, unless the content is different (for instance, presenter reporting on an issue but film report shows the next item). In cases of many film reports followed in a row, every new issue is considered a new item.

Coding Categories

The first point of reference is the capturing of date of publication, page number of article and number of articles on the page, counting from top left to right bottom of a page. On TV, the page number is referred to as 'zero' and reports counted from 1 upwards as part of the same 'page'. Page numbers are counted continuous, even if certain media are re-listing the page numbers of every section. Page 1 of the economy section might have been coded as 101, page 2 as 102, etc. By applying this, research would be able to show the importance of certain issues and topics according to the position within the newspaper or TV news report. The volume and dates will indicate the intensiveness and length of the coverage. Finally, the name of the publication is captured from a drop-down list. A reference is made as to the section of the article/report within its editorial context (news, political, opinion, business, etc). Pictures, caricatures, graphics not forming part of an article are counted as separate articles. For instance, a photograph of famine in Africa with two paragraphs underneath, are considered as an individual article.

Information on articles/report

First the region on which the presentation focuses, or where the depicted events have (predominantly) taken place are captured. In case the place/event cannot geographically be determined, 'country unknown;' is entered. Other options included 'world-wide' and 'several countries', the latter being only applicable if a counting of individual countries space by lines received do not produce a majority reference. Where international organisations, such as the United Nations or EU are involved, the geographical region is determined as 'international organisation'.

Topics and aspects are chosen from an extensive drop-down list. Instructions to the coders are given to select only the single topic prevailing amongst the others, determined by space (lines, centimetres, seconds) in the article/report. Selecting topics involved clicking through three levels of listed topics available (see Appendix A for list of individual issues and levels).

- Level one represented the main categories (23 in total) being: Ethics, politics, crime, domestic issues, foreign affairs, EU affairs, economy, business, associations and unions, media, NGO, social issues, health, women's issues, education, culture, environment and traffic, research and science, history, HIV/Aids, sport, other issues.
- Level two are subcategories of level one, 154 in total. The issue of 'ethics' e.g. is further subdivided into 'ethical values', 'democracy', 'justice', 'human rights', 'individual responsibility' and others.
- Level three comprised of a total of 1569 individual issues covering the categories on level 2 and 1.

Examples:

Level one: HIV/Aids; Level two: Prevention of HIV/Aids, causes of HIV/Aids, effects of HIV/Aids, level three: use of Nevirapine, blood transfusion.

Level one: Economy; Level two: Economical indicators; Level three: CPIX index, PPI index, Rand value.

Numerical units to the levels are allocated on a six-digit base:

Level one (e.g. Crime): 13

Level two (e.g. non-politically motivated crime): (13)14

Level three (e.g. murder): (1314)25

The final code therefore always represents the two subcategories above and enables regrouping of topics into different issues.

All issues are coded from the point of view of the country concerned. For instance, Gerhard Schröder's campaign to become Germany's chancellor, is coded under 'home affairs' and not 'foreign affairs', irrespective of the country of the newspaper.

The main protagonist or newsmaker of the individual article/report is defined with a similar concept as the topics/issues. An individual, a group of people, an organisation, a company or an institution is selected from a three level list, depending on the prevalence of individual protagonists covered in the article/report.

- Level one represented the main category (24 categories) including: country in general, government, president, parliament, semi-governmental organisations, judiciary, police, army, provincial government, political parties, economy, unions, society, foreign country, foreign government, foreign head of government, foreign legislative, foreign authorities, foreign local authorities, foreign politicians and political parties, foreign economy, foreign society, international organisations, other newsmakers.
- Level two represented the secondary categories (212) including e.g. (Northern Province provincial government, Free State provincial government etc).
- Level three included 2542 international protagonists of sub-categories two and one.

Examples:

Level one: Political parties; Level two: ANC; Level three: ANC Gauteng, ANC Mpumalanga

Level one: Society; Level two: Minorities; Level three: Greek community, German community.

Level one: Government; Level two: National Department of Housing; Level three: Minister of Housing, Deputy Minister.

Numerical units to the levels are again allocated on a six-digit base:

Level one (e.g. South African provincial government): 63

Level two (e.g. Northern Province provincial government): (63)01

Level three (e.g. Northern Province: Department of Public Works): (6301)26

If an article or report, in terms of quantity, focused equally on two protagonists, the one which is presented rather than quoted is chosen (e.g. President Bush making statements on the Iraqi Government, the latter would have been chosen).

For the individual category lists, please see Appendix A.

In terms of research results, it is necessary to regroup the individual issues into three categories, since it would be able to highlight first on a wider scale the majority of issues and enable, if questions arose, to look further into individual issue that contributed to a specific image. For instance, in terms of crime coverage (category one) it is necessary to look into the second level (terrorism, crime fighting, murder) etc, to identify the different individual issues contributing to the overall image of 'crime'.

Persons quoted/shown

All individuals, to whom at least five lines of an article or five seconds of a television news story are dedicated or who are named in the headline or shown in a photograph, caricatures are recorded. An extensive drop-down list of names is used (4 384 individual names). In case the individual's name is not included on the list, it is entered according to his/her profession, origin, sex and race. The results will show the importance of foreign versus national protagonists in terms of coverage received and would also allow the identification of key persona responsible for issues on specific countries.

Rating of issues and protagonists

The rating of an issue or protagonists refers to the bias or tendency contained in the presentation by a journalist, protagonist or his partners as well as independent sources. The tendency can be expressed:

- explicitly, by using terms of clearly positive or negative judgement (for instance 'good', 'promising', 'ominous', 'disappointing').
- implicitly, if the presented content is embedded in a positive or negative context.

Example: 'Government has done a great job in combating crime' would be a positive explicit reference. In a positive or negative implicit reference the described circumstances are generally understood to be either positive or negative (e.g. company financial losses or corruption).

Since explicit and implicit tendencies of presentations can differ, both are coded separately. Since many media avoid the responsibility of bias by not 'explicitly' stating something but rather describe a scenario, context reporting is rather powerful as the choice of context still lies in the hand of the editor. Although a TV station might not explicitly state an opinion, continuous negative context reporting is in itself a way of expressing an opinion. Explicit caution is applied when selecting the two different tendencies and only in undoubtedly cases, positive or negative is selected as reference. In case no tendency is assumed, 'neutral' is chosen. Where both positive and negative tendencies applied, the dominating aspects are determined and coded either as 'rather positive' or 'rather negative'. In case positive and negative tendencies are in balance, 'ambivalent' is chosen.

The full scale applied is as following:

| | | | | | | |
|-----------------|----------|-----------------|------------|-----------------|----------|---------|
| Explicit | positive | rather positive | ambivalent | rather negative | negative | neutral |
| Implicit | positive | rather positive | ambivalent | rather negative | negative | neutral |

Examples:

Article reports neutrally and without explicitly mentioning anything on a highjacking attempt, where the police have arrested the perpetrators. The explicit rating would be neutral and the context ambivalent (both a negative aspect – highjacking – as well as a positive aspect – arrest – are addressed).

Same article, but in this case the journalists adds that 'this is only a single incident, in 99% of the cases police do not catch the criminals'. In this case, the implicit rating would remain ambivalent, but the explicit rating would be negative.

Generally speaking, the following chart will indicate the outcome of the rating for both explicit and implicit ratings.

| | | | |
|-----------------|----------|----------|---------|
| Explicit | positive | negative | neutral |
|-----------------|----------|----------|---------|

|------------------------------------|---|---|---|
| No of statements in article | 1 | 4 | 7 |
|------------------------------------|---|---|---|

| | | | | | | |
|-------------------------|----------|-----------------|------------|-----------------|----------|---------|
| Explicit | positive | rather positive | ambivalent | rather negative | negative | neutral |
| Choice of rating | | | | X | | |

| | | | |
|------------------------------------|----------|----------|---------|
| Implicit | positive | negative | neutral |
| No of statements in article | 4 | 3 | 1 |

| | | | | | | |
|-------------------------|----------|-----------------|------------|-----------------|----------|---------|
| Implicit | positive | rather positive | ambivalent | rather negative | negative | neutral |
| Choice of rating | | X | | | | |

A combination of explicit and implicit ratings established the overall ‘rating’ of a subject or issue, whereby equal weight is given.

Example:

| | | | | | | |
|-----------------------|----------|------------------------|-------------------|------------------------|----------|---------|
| Explicit | positive | rather positive | ambivalent | rather negative | negative | neutral |
| Implicit | positive | rather positive | ambivalent | rather negative | negative | neutral |
| Overall Rating | positive | rather positive | ambivalent | rather negative | negative | neutral |

For the purpose of this research, negative overall ratings will be used to show ‘bad news’, while overall positive ratings will highlight ‘good news’.

Detailed coding

In cases where the research is not general, but based on client requirements, the above mentioned methodology is applied on a sentence by sentence basis for all protagonists mentioned with at least five lines per article. Referred to as ‘statement-by-statement’ analysis, this is much more thorough and allows a more detailed analysis of information flow within an article. Coding criteria are applied as before.

Coding procedure

The trainer is supervising the physical process of analysis on a daily basis and establishing an inter-coder reliability by coding selected articles himself and benchmarked this against the local results. The trainer is trained in the methodology during a four week training period in Germany, receiving ‘refresher courses’ every year.

All analysts are trained by the coder. On a daily basis, television news are recorded with backup tapes for every news item. Both newspapers as well as video tapes are captured daily by the analysts. When questions arose, the supervisor is able to answer them before the actual capturing took place. At the end of every coding day, the individual datasheets are collected and added to the general MS Access database. Data are verified every evening and the database entries corrected.

Analysis on statement level

In the filter, these have to be selected using at all times 'level=0 & polfilt=1'

A 'statement' is a unit of analysis that contains a subject, an issue, a rating, and a source. For each change in variables, a new statement is entered. One article can have numerous statements, as documented in the example. The example has 8 statements:

Methodology of media content analysis: Example

As stated below, some variables from the article level can be used for statement level as well. These are:

Medium

Date

Page

Number

Section

Style

Origin

Source

Area

Name of publication/medium, e.g. The Star, Beeld etc

Date when publication was printed. This is a date variable, not a string variable. Use the following example string:
date=date.dmy (1,4,2005)

The page number of the article

The article number on the page, from top left to right to bottom.

This highlights the section where the article was found, such as news front, news, business, business front and others.

Refers to the type of article/report (short, long etc)

refers to the origin or the article/report, being e.g. an agency report or from the journalist of the medium.

Additionally, the following variables can be used:

|---------------------------|--|
| Prot | The individual newsmaker on a statement level. |
| Leaders | all party leaders that have received coverage. Not a variable but can be used to distinguish between parties and leaders. Use [leaders=1] to only select the party leaders and [leaders=2] for political parties. |
| Isorce | the individual source making the statement |
| Sourcediv | [isource] recoded into groups of statement makers (such as government, companies etc). |
| Oppsplit | [isource] recoded into opposition party and leading party. |
| National | nationality of the person making the statement |
| Topic | the individual issue of the statement |
| Toptwo | a second set of categories, recoded from [topic] |
| Topthree | a third set of categories, recoded from [toptwo] |
| Policy | [topic] recoded into policy and non-policy issues. |
| Note | any possible notes made by the coder. This is used when general codes are selected by the analyst because no precise codes exist. This is to be checked by all 'other' codes. |
| Ursource | the subdivision for some sources. See appendix for applicable sources [isource] used. |
